Deinstitutionalising the Amateur Ethic: An Empirical Examination of Change in a Rugby Union Football Club

Danny O'Brien^{1, a} and Trevor Slack^{1, a, ✉}

^aDeMontfort University

Available online 30 July 2008.

In 1996/97, the first season of openly professional rugby union was played in England. For many of the clubs which opted to become involved in the professional game, this was the end of an era. In some cases, over 100 years of institutionalised amateur practice was brought to an end, and professionalism became the dominant mode of operation in these organisations. In order for those clubs which chose to professionalise to operate effectively, the values and related organisational structures which were the very essence of amateurism, had to be deinstitutionalised. Deinstitutionalisation is the erosion or discontinuity of organisational activities and practices, which through the force of habit, tradition, or history, have come to be accepted as legitimate. This paper provides a case study analysis of the process of deinstitutionalisation as it occurred in one Premiership rugby union club. Using data collected

Introduction

Performing sports activities brings with it the possibility of producing alterations in muscle-tendinous structures and joints through trauma or overuse.

Both these pathologies imply that the activities are to be suspended, which often leads to the athlete, who is by definition an active individual, having to accept his/her condition, something which is not always easy to do. Therefore, the athlete and the entire sports environment surrounding him/her expect the problem to be solved in the shortest possible time.

The mandatory clinical examination, even if often able to provide precise information, must also include a diagnostic study which confirms or details the clinical data.

This means that diagnostic imaging is a fundamental step in orthopedic sports injuries. It is essential, however, that the imaging technique/s chosen for the trauma be tailored on the basis of the sensitivity and specificity of each individual technique in relation to the type of injury. Moreover, the specialist must be well versed in this particular field of pathology.

Indeed, also on the basis of my personal experience as the radiologist responsible
